What Is Api3 (API3) ?

In December of 2020, API3 was released as a platform with the intention of addressing critical problems in the blockchain industry. It makes it possible for dApps (decentralised applications) built on the blockchain to use APIs (application programming interfaces) to connect to external, nonblockchain-based data and services. Using API connectivity, the technology simplifies and standardises the method by which data from the real world may be supplied into blockchain applications.

In the world of app and software development, APIs are the gold standard. In order to avoid having to start from scratch with each new project, developers frequently make use of preexisting APIs to import preexisting services or select datasets. APIs are the backbone of a lot of the programmes and tools we use every day, and API3 is the next evolutionary step in this direction.

Most APIs have been developed for older systems employed by centralised applications, making them incompatible with the distributed ledger technology (blockchain) and its associated applications. To address this issue, API3 sets out to conform APIs to the decentralised norms of Web 3.0. The platform achieves this without putting undue strain on dApp developers and API providers, thereby fusing them into a cutting-edge ecosystem.

API3 makes it possible for more data suppliers to make more money by cutting out the middlemen and making it simpler for them to run their own nodes. Because of this, more service providers are joining the decentralised network. At its core, API3 is helping to democratise access to information across the blockchain network thanks to its novel approach, sophisticated DAO, and decentralised governance architecture.
