What is Band Protocol?

Band Protocol (BAND) was created in 2017 to create a bridge between the traditional web and the blockchain by providing real-world data to the decentralized network. It is run by an ambitious team led by Soravis Srinawakoon, an experienced software developer and consultant, acting as the CEO, and Sorawit Suriyakarn serving as the CTO.

This protocol serves as a platform for decentralized applications (dApps), to leverage their smart contract data points to gain accessibility to external solutions. The whitepaper stated, “Band Protocol intends to solve data accessibility and data reliability in a fully decentralized manner. This includes how Band provides data endpoint such that any smart contracts can easily consume real-world data and data governance mechanism to ensure data integrity.”

It presents a solution for blockchain oracles which is the inaccessibility to real-world data on the chain. This is a deterrent to the expansion of the DeFi ecosystem and the development of applications within the blockchain as a whole because their uses are within a closed system. Band Protocol eliminates the need for middlemen and the issues regarding scalability and data security during connection by depending on its native blockchain, which was initially launched on the Ethereum blockchain but currently operates with Cosmos-developed Inter-Blockchain Communication Protocol (IBC). The security system within the protocol is enabled by a Delegated Proof-of-Stake (dPoS) consensus mechanism.

BAND is the native token that powers Band Protocol. This token was launched in September 2019 on Binance through an Initial Exchange Offering (IEO). The value of BAND tokens is deflationary, which is intended to encourage the protocol's users to stake their tokens and get rewarded for it. They're also used in lending and other transaction services with dApps accessing the data points via a data aggregator within the decentralized network.
