Cryptocurrency prices have started to recover, but the industry's current status has given Crypto Twitter plenty to complain about.

Despite the fact that many top coins have increased by double digits over the past week, there has been little rejoicing on Crypto Twitter. Rather, the decision by the U.S. Treasury Department to prohibit Americans from utilizing the cryptocurrency privacy mixer Tornado Cash or trading with Ethereum addresses associated with its community has been the focus of much discussion this week on social media.

The Treasury stated the action was necessary because thieves had “laundered more than $7 billion worth of virtual money since its inception in 2019.” Someone on Twitter brought up the fact that when sanctions were imposed, about the same amount of money was held in Tornado.

A security analyst at MetaMask named Harry.eth (@sniko_) tweeted that the Treasury Department cannot penalize the entire Tornado network. Layer 2 protocols continue to use it.

Vitalik Buterin, the creator of Ethereum and a Russian native, confessed on Tuesday that he had sent money to Ukraine using the platform.

On this note, curious if there are documented examples of TC having been used for this. Obviously self-identifying sort of defeats the point but e.g. groups or guides recommending people to do so?

Possible difficulties in enforcing the Tornado ban exist. On Tuesday, it was reported that despite the restriction, an anonymous Tornado user was distributing modest amounts of Ethereum to industry leaders and celebrities via “hundreds” of Tornado wallets.

UniSwap creator Hayden Adams has spoken out about the importance of privacy tools. Adams, echoing numerous other business leaders on Twitter, called the sanctions a “freedom of speech problem,” pointing to the Federal court case Bernstein v. U.S. from 1996, which recognized “source code as speech” protected by the First Amendment.

My thoughts on the tornado situation:

1) Privacy is critical for a functional and safe society. Arguments that privacy is only for illegal activity are absurd/dangerous and reminds me of the people that want to make encryption illegal.

Please note that on Monday, action was also taken by Github, the code platform that hosted Tornado Cash’s code. Github took down the Tornado source and temporarily banned Roman Semenov, the creator of Tornado Cash.

At long last, on Friday, the Netherlands Crime Agency (FIOD) announced the arrest of a “suspected” Tornado Cash developer. The crypto community and privacy advocates reacted strongly to the revelation by calling it a declaration of war on coders.

Why the UniSwap community is so divided over a $74 million proposal to create a UniSwap Foundation is beyond the comprehension of Joel Miyazawa, a governance expert at crypto intelligence firm Messari.

Uniswap's treasury is worth approximately $2 billion ☐

The Uniswap Foundation proposal is asking for $74 million. That's ~4% of Uniswap's treasury...

And the Uniswap Community is divided. Why?

All USDC held by wallets on the government’s sanctions list were frozen by the USDC issuer Circle after the Tornado Cash sanctions. This caused MakerDAO to reevaluate its dependence on Circle, the USDC’s central issuer. Currently, MakerDAO’s DAI stablecoin is tied to USDC.

Vitalik Buterin, creator of the cryptocurrency Ethereum, instantly voiced his opposition to the plan, calling it “a hazardous and horrible concept.”

MakerDAO is considering a $3.5 billion ETH market buy, converting all USDC from the peg stability module into ETH.

On Friday, Chinese blockchain journalist Colin Wu provided additional context for the story.

Affected by the tornado sanctions, MakerDAO founder Rune Christensen said that he is seriously considering moving away from using USDC as collateral and converting USDC into ETH. Vitalik said non-ETH collateral should be allowed to exceed 20% of the total.
