What is Loopring (LRC)?

Loopring (LRC) was originally an open protocol with the intention of creating decentralised cryptocurrency exchanges. In addition, the protocol enables users to utilise zero-knowledge proofs (ZKPs) to establish an Ethereum network-based order book exchange that is not custodial. When using a non-custodial exchange, customers retain ownership of the private keys that safeguard their cryptocurrency and money.

Rumour has it that Loopring, a new protocol from DeFi, would support a number of different virtual currencies, the most important of which being its native utility token, LRC. The protocol's stated goal is to promote the creation of new types of crypto-asset exchanges by a worldwide community of users running a platform with a reputation for doing just that.

Loopring asserts that its exchanges may provide dealers quicker settlement through the utilisation of zk-rollups. With Zk-rollups, a Layer 2 scaling solution, blockchains can validate transactions more quickly and with less gas.

The Loopring platform employs cryptography (zk-rollups) to enable exchanges to construct upon it, evading the slow speeds and exorbitant fees connected with Ethereum's decentralised exchanges. Traders will find this useful for comparing prices of digital assets. Therefore, Loopring exchanges can offload critical computations off the Ethereum blockchain and have them executed elsewhere thanks to zero-knowledge rollups. The basic premise is that traders will enjoy faster and cheaper transactions if Loopring exchanges are required to submit fewer transactions to the Ethereum network.
