What is Storj (STORJ)?

Storj is a free and public cloud storage service. It was first proposed in 2014 as a way to create an encrypted, decentralised cloud storage network using peer-to-peer technology. A revised whitepaper for the project released a few years after its initial introduction described the system as a decentralised network that would bring together consumers in need of cloud storage and those with spare hard drive space to offer.

Storj is a decentralised alternative to traditional cloud storage services. It's not like other "cloud" storage options, which rely on server farms. Instead, Storj is hosted on a distributed cluster of servers. Connecting computers from all across the world is simple. Simply by installing Tardigrade, any user with a spare terabyte of storage space can participate in the network as a node.

Storj was created in 2014 by Shawn Wilkinson, a software engineer located in Atlanta. He was a co-founder alongside John Quinn from the very beginning. Quinn has a background in business development and is a huge fan of cryptocurrencies. The two men worked together from the concept's inception to its present form, publishing an original whitepaper, forming the firm Storj Labs Inc., and refining the project along the way.

Before we continue on, it's worth noting that the local currency of Storj is also called Storj. This asset is represented on cryptocurrency exchanges by the ticker symbol "STORJ". In order to participate in the Storj market as a normal trader or investor, you will need to acquire this digital money. This article offers price forecasts for this digital currency.

From now on, Storj, Storj token, and STORJ will all be used synonymously.
